A New Web Site by the National Film Board of Canada

Why did Albertans fight proposals to build a sour gas well on their land? What was the price of industrial growth in small-town B.C.? How has acid rain devastated eastern Canada's farmland and forests?

In Canada our lives unfold against backdrops of mountains, prairies, lakes, beaches, icebergs and urban sprawl. The links we forge with our surroundings are unbreakable. Footprints: Environment and the Way We Live is the one-stop Web site for exploring this relationship through film. Click to discover the ecological issues of seven decades. Explore new challenges our people, wildlife and plants face as natural resources dwindle. Examine solutions in these times of climate change.

The National Film Board of Canada is offering 124 films and 191 clips free online, all chosen from its vast collection. You'll also find photos, audio clips, interviews and critical points of view by environmental experts to really get you thinking about the environment. Teachers will find free interactive lesson plans to use in the classroom. Footprints: Environment and the Way We Live is the latest in the NFB's growing number of educational Web sites available at www.nfb.ca/education.
